- This will be an opportunity to ask Deputy Chancellor Kim about such topics as COVID and schools (testing, outdoor lunches and education, vaccinations, virtual learning), overcrowding in schools and the recent community working group, and the upcoming budget cycle.
- Director Abbott will be talking with us about the new DCPS curriculum and instructional approach for elementary social studies and math.

What's your view on whether DC should rate

Take the State Board of Education's survey on DC's school quality rating...

DC's public schools are rated annually (except during the pandemic, when Parcc tests, a key ingredient of the rating, aren't been given!) with 1-5 STARs. Are you familiar with it? Do you use it? Does it rate what's important to you?

Last year, the State Board of Education (SBOE), after hearing from experts and community members and conducting its own research, the SBOE adopted an interim report outlining what it learned and a resolution that identified three major concerns with the rating:

 It "produces ratings that are systematically lower for schools that enroll larger proportions of students designated at-risk — and that these lower ratings do not necessarily reflect lower quality education."

 Under our current system, a low rating does not clarify the schools deeds and leaves all but a few schools "without the state support they need to provide the stronger education their students need."

Recognizing that the rating may place excessive weight on test scores, "We may want to provide a broader view of school quality by expanding the range of STAR indicators included in our current rating."

As a result of these concerns, the SBOE is now preparing recommendations for improving how the District reports on school quality. Please let us know what you think. Is it important to have rating--or is transparent information on school quality and performance what you need? Either way, what are the elements of school quality that you are most interested in knowing about?

Last chance to weigh in on renaming Wilson High School!

As many of you know, the DC Council voted last year to change the name of Woodrow Wilson High School. The name change process called for a community survey to inform the subsequent process, followed by a proposal for a new name from the Mayor, followed by a vote by the DC Council. Last December, the survey was conducted, and a plurality of those participating favored "August Wilson" for the new name--after the great African-American playwright. The Mayor followed with a formal proposal to rename the school "August Wilson High School." The DC Council has now proposed to rename the school Jackson Reed, after the high school's first African-American teacher and Vincent Reed, the school's first African-American principal who then became the superintendent of DC Public Schools. The council held a hearing two weeks ago on the name and will hold another one this coming Thursday. To see the testimony from earlier this month, click here.
